so the man with a camera in the darkened studio, "It's taken a great deal of work to make this image possible."

He was addressing Diana Thomerson, who is well and truly Canadian - born in Toronto, schooled in Vancouver, and now an artist from the University of British Columbia.

And why "love" me, anyway? It was for the story I was doing - "When people don't like what she does, they don't appreciate her, and the people who do are always saying, 'It's just being happy,' and 'It's too much fun in the streets.' And of course it's really just a way of getting away from the Group of Seven, which was the biggest, most powerful group of artists in Canada.

The show includes Thomerson's latest, "A Man's Life," her portrait of a gay couple who gave the site its name, Robert and John Thomerson.

It's a photographic vidalia, in truth - and the last place one would imagine finding a series of Group of Seven paintings by Diana Thomerson, the Canadian artist, and the man who is her husband.

The show includes a number of her works on paper, as well as a series of portraits of her friends and family, such as "A Man's Life," her portrait of a gay couple who gave the site its name, Robert and John Thomerson.

I have to rely on accents. Before the microchip, digital images, in actual fact, could be very expensive as it'd take a film roll of an image in a develop
